This is to submit my comments on the Microsoft anti-trust settlement:

1. It is encouraging that the justice department was able to save the tax payers money by allowing Netscape to write/dictate the complaint. They didn't charge us for that, did they?
2. I was much encouraged that the word monopoly was used so frequently in the complaint. I am sure that by using the word so frequently it must be true.
3. Now that you have used millions of our tax-payer dollars to prosecute this case, I am sure the reasonable prices previously experienced by the American software users will be greatly enhanced. This, I am sure will offset the great expense.

Conclusion: If you haven't determined from my remarks, I feel this entire proceeding is a miscarriage of justice. However, since justice is not the business of the American court system, I hope at least the lawyers who profited had a good time.

I believe it is in the best interest of the American people to complete this case now, with the settlement that is on the table.
